DEMOCRACY AND EDUCATION

Democracies depend on education for their existence . . . Modern school systems, therefore, teach history and literature because these reveal man in the process of his development, and help in the formation of ideals which guide in individual and social conduct; they teach geography and natural history because these tell of the environment in which men have to live; they teach science because it gives the power to control the forces of nature; they teach music, drawing, and the other fine arts because these arts open the eyes of men to see the beauties of the world about them, develop their emotional life, and help them to express what words cannot; and finally they give vocational training -- the technique, methods, and habits of work -- to enable men to make a living intelligently and to solve their economic and industrial problems. To accomplish these results, it is necessary that the means of education be organized through cooperating groups. A democratic state is such a cooperative society. Education should be its chief function.
