A LIBERAL EDUCATION

A LIBERAL education should leave a man unprepared but ready; unprepared for jobs requiring special training or skill, but ready in mind and body for training. It is a fact that most companies today prefer to train their employees on the job and this holds true for most types of work. An employee who has a certain readiness to learn, who is free from faulty or old-fashioned training, and who can see beyond the immediate needs of a specific job is an asset to any company. The capacity of being unprepared but ready may save a man from suffering the fate of those who, after a period of narrow vocational training, find that the job for which they have been preparing has been eliminated by the rapid technical change ever present in modern industry.
